

Digital Humanities Summer Scholars

The UGA Libraries in conjunction with the Willson Center for Arts and Humanities and the UGA Press is pleased to announce a summer research program for students interested in the digital humanities.

We are looking for motivated students to work on a digital humanities research project of their own design from June 1--July 10. Students will initiate and develop their own research projects while participating in workshops and weekly discussions of readings from a shared syllabus that addresses the major questions and principles in the field of digital humanities.

This session is designed under the Experiential Learning rubric with a fulltime commitment of six weeks. We are offering $1,000 funded through the Willson Center, OVPR, and the Libraries as a research award for the most promising research projects.

Emily McGinn, Digital Humanities Coordinator, will lead the sessions with support from faculty related to the DIGI initiative and participation by other members of the UGA Libraries.

At the end of the summer session students will create a small Digital Humanities project and present on their work in the fall.

Benefits of this program include:

- Building DH skills with a community of other scholars
- Time to work on your own ideas and develop new research questions
- Practical experience in digital tools and project management
- Professionalization of research and presentation skills

To find out more about Digital Humanities at UGA visit Digi.uga.edu.

To apply: please send your resume, a writing sample, a copy of your unofficial transcripts and a 100-200 word summary of your proposed digital project or interest in learning about digital humanities to Emily McGinn mcginn@uga.edu. Applications received by February 15, 2018 will receive first consideration. An interview will be required for final candidates.